The invention generally relates to the field of cellular telephone technology, and in particular to a system and method for estimating channel conditions. Low-noise block-convolution (LNB) receivers are designed to use automatic frequency control (AFC) to synchronously lock to an incoming signal. AFC is also used by a receiver to track the frequency of a signal as it changes due to Doppler frequency, motion or interference. AFC is used to adjust the frequency of the local oscillator signal so that a despread signal will have the same frequency as that of the incoming signal. AFC is particularly effective in a satellite system where the frequency of the incoming signal can change by as much as several hundred MHz due to Doppler frequency, motion or interference. In such a system, the frequency of the incoming signal is calibrated in software by the receiver during manufacture. The receiver is operated in a loop that automatically tries to synchronize the frequency of the incoming signal by measuring the frequency of a signal generated by the local oscillator using a frequency measurement system. Once the loop is locked, the receiver runs until a sync burst is received that is generally decoded by the receiver by performing a block-convolution operation. The receiver must initially lock to the signal and then monitor the frequency of the incoming signal until the signal is pushed out of the receiver. One problem with the conventional approach is that if the incoming signal drifts away too quickly, it may not be possible for the receiver to lock to the incoming signal. To address this problem, the receiver's AFC is driven to a very high gain state before the transmitter starts transmitting. In this manner, the receiver will be able to lock onto the incoming signal and track its frequency by catching the high gain state of the AFC before the transmission starts. The amount of time the AFC is activated before a sync burst is received is called the capture time. Unfortunately, once a sync burst has been received, the AFC is deactivated and the local oscillator signal captures the frequency of the incoming signal. The frequency of the local oscillator signal must then be quickly brought back to the desired frequency before the signal fades away.
